My browser often gets a network error downloading large images (e.g. 1 MB or more) on a page (e.g. StackExchange) that has high traffic. It's not a request from the page itself, because if I open the Network tab in Chrome DevTools I can see that the server is returning 304 status code with the cached image. How can I disable this? It's annoying me enough that I'm thinking of switching to Safari. A: The page you're hitting is just putting images on the page. In Firefox, look at the Network tab in the DevTools (or the Network tab in the tab itself). There's no difference between a regular page and one that has images on it. It's always the same thing. So that's why you always get the image back. Q: Android Studio I can't find my APK I'm working on a react-native app which I've build with my own account on GitHub. I made the build on another account which has his own api key, that he gave me. The problem is that the build is succesfull and the.apk is in my emulator but in my personal folder there is only a.bundle and no.apk. Does someone know why? Thanks! Ok 82157476af
